The Goal of Love, by Jean Marc

" Love one another as I myself have loved you".

More profound the darkness, the more clear is the light. This is true and manifests itself because the darkness and the light are indivisible: one serving the other in the same domain, the domain of our destiny.

Since the dawn of time, sages have revealed to us the 'destiny' of love. If we admit that no one is a stranger to that destiny, we would not have any scope for choice, nor any despair, nor any sense of culpability or any intolerance.

The act and the truth would be the measure of courage; the gratitude would be of richness and the forgiveness would be that of liberty.

What we call 'evil', in the final analysis would not but appear as 'love' which tries to find itself.

We ask ourselves finally: " Is it truer to have love than to be the love?"

No one is a stranger to the destiny of love and all of us will return to it, for, in this universe there exists only one will ----- HIS WILL.
